The American Physical Society publishes 17 world-leading journals and the online magazine Physics. In this talk, I'll describe how these journals – known collectively as the Physical Review series – are developing to cover research beyond pure physics and our approach to challenges such as research misconduct, AI, and evolving expectations for scientific publishing. I'll provide editor tips for authors and referees and invite your feedback on how you see the journals. Finally, I'll share my experience on a career path where I leapt from basic condensed matter research, to being an editor, a science writer, and now a director at a society publisher.
